$1 Million Dollars Awarded for Low-Income Afterschool Literacy Programs

SACRAMENTO, Calif --- Following a victory by Assemblymember Mike A. Gipson (D-Carson) from the 2018 Budget, the California State Library has just awarded $1 million in grant funding to non-profits and organizations across the state in an effort to improve literacy for low-income youth. The California Student Author Program supports local programs for low-income students to participate in out-of-school, structured writing instruction. Students learn to write, edit, and publish their own work, and build marketing and media skills. The programs are designed to help young people improve English language abilities, boost academic performance, build healthy relationships with the community, and make positive life choices. Gipson first took interest in the issue after learning about a local literacy program in his district, called PHAAB 5.

"I am incredibly proud of the work being done by PHABB 5 and others to help close the gap when it comes to academic achievement and am excited to see these resources used to invest in some of our most promising youth," stated Gipson. "These programs will not only focus on their literacy and writing skills, but will also prepare them to be future leaders and entrepreneurs. Through this grant effort, we can give youth the confidence and the skills they need to strive for their most ambitious goals and reach their full potential."

"Writing makes a person stronger. Not only does writing build stronger communications skills – essential for success in the economy that powers our world – but it can also heal. It can sharpen aspirations into achievable goals and share feelings that are hard to say out loud," said California State Librarian Greg Lucas. "All of these grant recipients are helping California kids experience all those things – and more. Thank you to Assemblyman Gipson for spearheading this program. The State Library is honored to be part of it."
